Both the transibial technique (TT) and the direct lateral approach (DLA) for arthroscopic ACL reconstruction (ACLR) have been widely used in the clinical setting. This prospective randomized controlled study compared the 2 techniques. From July 2009 to August 2012, 94 patients were randomly divided into two groups: the TT group (n = 49) and the DLA group (n = 45). Inclusion criteria included patients who underwent primary ACLR using single-bundle grafts and had at least 2 years of follow-up. In both groups, the tibial tunnel was placed using the TT technique. In the TT group, the femoral tunnel was placed using the anteromedial portal. In the DLA group, the femoral tunnel was placed by passing the tibial tunnel and the femoral tunnel from anterolateral to posteromedial direction. Two years after surgery, the evaluation was performed using clinical tests, including the Lachman test, pivot-shift test, side-to-side difference (SSD) of anterior translation, and KT-1000 arthrometer. The subjects were evaluated at 3 months and 2 years postoperatively. In the TT group, there was a significant improvement in Lachman test and pivot-shift test scores from 3 months to 2 years after surgery
