Optogenetics: a viable strategy for the study and treatment of affective disorders. The elucidation of the neurobiological basis for psychiatric diseases is of high priority, as it will benefit the development of effective treatment strategies. Recent advances in the technological manipulation of neural activity, using light to control genetically-encoded ion channels and receptors, are facilitating the development of new experimental strategies. In this review, we describe the new field of light-gated optogenetics and its applications in the study of the neural systems that control complex behaviours such as learning and emotion. We will explore the theory and function of light-gated protein channels and receptors, their use in determining their natural ligands, and discuss the possible advantages, limitations and future applications of this powerful tool. Finally, we will describe briefly the implementation of these methods for the manipulation of neuronal excitability and the testing of novel treatment strategies. Q: asynchronous processing of multiprocessing.Process I have a program which does calculations. Sometimes, on some inputs, the result may be very big, in which case I cannot store all the results in memory at once and so I have to calculate the result in subprocesses, one for each input. I import multiprocessing as mp class Worker(mp.Process): def __init__(self, *args): super(Worker, self).__init__(*args) self._result = None def run(self): #... calculation... if self._result is None: # output the result if it was not already written # and continue calculation for the next input else: raise AssertionError(f'[self._result] was already written') def main(): proc = mp.Process(target=Worker, args=('a','b','c')) proc.start() proc.join() if __name__ == '__main__': main() The input is a, b and c. The output will
