Antonine Wall Antonine Wall () is a section of an ancient defensive wall of the Roman Empire, erected in about AD 140 to separate the Roman-ruled region of Britannia from the native Britons. The Antonine Wall is located in the Central Lowlands of Scotland (roughly between Glasgow and Edinburgh), though there is some dispute as to whether the wall is located in Scotland, or is a Roman military structure in England. History Pertinent to the question of whether the wall is located in Scotland or England are the following facts: The original construction was commissioned by Emperor Antoninus Pius, who in AD 140, quelled a revolt in Britain. The wall was fully completed by Marcus Aurelius around AD

175. The wall was designed to be a long barrier, extending from the Forth up to the Clyde, and extended about. There is archaeological evidence that the wall was a barrier that prevented the Britons from the south crossing the Firth of Forth and heading north. There is evidence that the wall was fully repaired by the emperor Commodus (who reigned AD 180–192) but not fully completed. Some Roman artefacts from the wall have been discovered in nearby Aberlady. The Antonine Wall is the first instance of a successful imperial campaign in the British Isles. The wall successfully created a barrier between Britannia and Caledonia, c. AD 141 to c. AD 160. Use and purpose The Antonine Wall was built to prevent border raids and to discourage rebellion against Roman rule in the Roman Empire. The wall ran north-east, from the Firth of Forth, passing through Carriden and going through the Antonine Wall fort at Aberlemno, to Carriden again. It ran through Bannockburn to Prestonpans, before continuing across the Tweed to Traprain Law. It then proceeded down the Tweed to the mouth of the River Teviot, passing through Peebles, Innerleithen, Selkirk and Kelso, and crossing to the north-west, to Inveresk. It then ran along the Moray Firth to Tain, where it met the existing Antonine Wall. Construction The British army managed to build the wall between AD 138 and AD 141. It cost a total of £190,000, comprising two million cubic metres of stone, and of turf and earth.
