This invention relates to novolac dispersions of poly(arylene ether ketones) and to dispersions of arylene ether ketones. Poly(arylene ether ketones) (PAEKs) are a class of high temperature polymers known for their outstanding chemical resistance, excellent thermal stability, and mechanical properties (see, e.g., Encyclopedia of Polymer Science and Technology, 2nd Ed., Wiley, New York, 1987, Vol. 8 pp. 69-72). It is well known that poly(aryl ether ketones) can be used to make high temperature composites. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,607,824 discloses composite poly(aryl ether ketone) fibers made from a solution of the poly(aryl ether ketone). These high temperature composites can be used for the protective clothing industry (see, e.g., U.S. Pat. No. 4,623,690), the aerospace industry, and the electronics industry. Although the poly(aryl ether ketone) is a useful polymer for a variety of applications, it would be advantageous to develop PAEK dispersions (PAEK dispersions would have the advantage of containing the polymer dispersed in a carrier medium and hence having improved mechanical properties compared to the poly(aryl ether ketone) alone). Tillotson et al. (U.S. Pat. No. 5,382,645) describes certain dispersions of poly(aryl ethers), but not PAEKs.
