An ADSL DSLR (Asymmetric Digital Subscriber Line Router) is a Internet router designed to be the last mile of Internet access for DSL (Digital Subscriber Line) lines. It is widely used in smaller networks where a switching router is too expensive to implement or because the services are located on the same premises as the DSL modem. An ADSL DSLR has a DSL modem (AOCE 3300 or AOCE 3300PRO), a crossover network, a Modem pooling to provide ADSL services and the Internet connection. When a DSL line is connected to the ADSL DSLR, data sent from the DSL line are "pushed" towards the Internet via the Internet connection. If a data packet is bigger than what can fit in the Internet connection, it is split into smaller packets and these are then "pushed" to the Internet via the Internet connection. The data packets sent by the modem to the DSL line are "pulled" from the Internet connection by the crossover network. A number of crossover switches connect the ADSL modem pool and the Internet connection. Each ADSL DSLR has one Ethernet interface that connects it to the ADSL modem pool and the Internet connection. For safety, the ADSL DSLR uses Spanning Tree Protocol (STP) to prevent the connection of any Ethernet interface to the network while the only Ethernet interface is down. You can change the Spanning Tree Protocol settings in the ADSL DSLR web page. All ADSL DSLRs are capable of initiating a VLAN trunk in the crossover network. Each ADSL DSLR has a dedicated Telnet interface. You can log on to the ADSL DSLR using a Telnet client, such as Network Terminal Server or a generic Telnet client (the Telnet command "tput smsoe" is not supported by ADSL DSLR). When a Telnet client is used to log on to an ADSL DSLR, the Telnet login data are stored in an event log. You can view the ADSL DSLR event log by using the Telnet command "eventlog". You can also send to the ADSL DSLR a series of Telnet commands. If you use the Telnet commands to make changes, the changes are not written to the ADSL DSLR event log. If you use the Telnet commands without any time limit, the data are automatically saved to the ADSL DSLR event log. In addition, you can use the ADSL DSLR event log to send detailed

The program allows you to monitor and examine various DSL parameters, especially on Broadcom-based routers or modems. It is a simple tool that can be very useful for active users. Installs $ sudo service avahi-daemon start [sudo] password for trevor: avahi-daemon started successfully. You can start/stop/restart it using: sudo avahi-daemon -r Hit CTRL-C to stop. $ sudo service avahi-daemon status avahi-daemon status avahi-daemon start/running A: The most common way is to run telnet on the modem (see here for how to telnet to your modem) and read the output - the parameters you're looking for will be listed in the output. EDIT: After installing a driver for your modem, you should be able to use an internet connection from that. Alternatively, you can use the following command: sudo tcpdump -p -i -s 0 -w -p is the flag for promiscuous mode (capture everything), -i is the -interface, -s is the sampling period (i.e. how many packets/bytes will be captured) and -w is the output filename - all parameters are optional. delhi Updated: Nov 06, 2017 21:55 IST Jitender Singh Sidhu, who joined the AAP on Wednesday in a bid to protect Sikh interests, may soon be brought in as a minister in Arvind Kejriwal's government, according to sources in the Delhi unit. Sidhu is contesting Lok Sabha elections as an independent and national president of the Shiromani Gurdwara Parbandhak Committee (SGPC), an autonomous religious body that runs seven gurdwaras in the national capital. He joined the AAP on Wednesday and soon after, met its Delhi unit chief Arvind Kejriwal to take oath as a Cabinet minister. Sources in the AAP, however, said Sidhu's nomination as a minister was being considered and he would be sworn in as per the Delhi governor's direction. A minister's status entitles him to an allowance of Rs five lakh per month, office accommodation and a Toyota Kijang. Sidhu joined the AAP in January after he spent 20 years as a member of
