4. Click OK. 5. Repeat Steps 3 and 4 for all the photographs you want to edit in this manner. 6. Use the eye dropper to select the colors from the original image that you want to use in the edited image. 7. Click Select All to select all the colors in the image. You don't have to click the eye dropper to select colors, but I suggest you do so to create a clean cut from the colors of the original into the selected colors of the edited photograph. Click Select All to select all the colors in the photograph. 8. Open the History palette in the toolbar. Doing so makes some of the changes you make in the Photo Editor visible in the History palette. When you make an edit in the Photo Editor, you'll see an Undo icon and a Redo icon in the History palette. 9. Click the eye dropper to select the colors you want to keep in the image. The Select tool is replaced by the Magic Wand tool. 10. Click the Rectangle tool and then drag a selection over the entire image. The Magic Wand tool then selects all the pixels in the image that are the selected color. 11. Click the eye dropper again to select the color you want to delete from the image. 12. Click the Adjustments button in the Photo Editor and select Color Balance from the menu. Notice that you can manipulate the individual colors using this dialog box. You can also create a custom image color profile using this dialog box. 13. Click the Browse button to open a dialog box that enables you to select a Color Management profile from your computer's hard drive. The Photo Downloader enables you to download a file to use in your computer. As long as you have a color profile for the current image and a color profile for your computer, you can use a downloaded file in place of the default image profile to make the color adjustments you want. Alternatively, if you don't want to download anything, you can use a Color Management profile to make a desired color adjustment. 14. Click OK. You can view the effect of your changes in the Photo Editor by pressing the Tab key until you return to the image. 15. Click the History palette and click the

Q: Is there a best practice for determining if a country's population is large enough to register a domain? I need to determine if a country's population is large enough to register a domain, but do not have any infrastructure available for running a DNS server and the quantity of web hosting capacity I have available does not allow me to satisfy a request that long. I was planning to check against the population of the country hosting the domain name, but I only need to satisfy a request for a top-level domain, so I do not necessarily need a specific subdomain. Is there any metric I can use, without having to run an expensive DNS server? A: I'd use WHOIS, as it's the lowest risk / effort / request type. The only additional "extra" you'd need to do is check the 'status' field, and only register the domain if the status says 'Active'. A reporter left a press conference after a gun charge suspect was bailed and filed a story about her experience. It was a tricky time for the media, considering that the woman arrested as part of the Operation Yewtree investigation had had her home raided and charged and bail set. But she was released. Given the OY investigation was still ongoing and the charges not yet dropped, that meant there was another operation in train for her, and she was an important part of it. She stood in the conference room of her newspaper and told the assembled media that she had been cleared to report on the investigation, but that she was worried that she'd be arrested again. (Later that day, she was.) But she'd made no comment, and she got a great deal of flak. Her story didn't say that charges against her had been dropped — despite the fact that they had, and she'd been ordered to stop talking about the case. It wasn't worth the time and the hassle, and besides, she was going to be on the stand in court in a few hours. Later, I spoke to some of the editorial board at the newspaper, and they told me they understood the predicament she was in. It was the correct course for her, in their judgment. But some of them seemed distinctly uneasy. It was, they agreed, a complex time. Yet another case was going through the system — a case made of the kind of people who attract attention, and of journalists, who attracted it
