The diagnosis of ventilator-associated pneumonia (VAP) was prospectively studied in 55 mechanically ventilated patients. Microbiologic samples and chest radiographs were obtained on days 1 to 3, and bacterial cultures and chest radiographs were repeated when clinical signs or laboratory results suggested the onset of pneumonia. Eight of the 16 patients in whom the diagnosis of VAP was made by radiologic criteria alone had negative microbiologic results for organisms known to be capable of causing pneumonia. Antibody responses to at least one of the five organisms commonly associated with nosocomial pneumonia were determined in patients with the diagnosis of VAP and in patients in whom the diagnosis of VAP was excluded by radiologic criteria. There was no significant association between the presence or absence of antibody and subsequent development of VAP. We conclude that antibody responses to intracellular organisms or invasive fungal infections are not helpful in the diagnosis of VAP.Q: Can

Just as the “R” word seems to be entering the mainstream, economists are beginning to see the term “recessions” in a new light. According to recent research, the word “recession” still carries the same negative connotations that it did in the 1960s. The research, conducted by economists at Yale and Stanford, finds that Americans are “increasingly pessimistic about the economy.” Moreover, the results of the research shows that “widespread unemployment may also lead to greater job pessimism.” While the results of the research are hardly surprising to anyone who keeps up with current events, the results of the research came as a surprise to the researchers themselves. The researchers were surprised, as they expected to see more jobs in the recovery and that workers’ beliefs about their jobs may lead to an increase in their pessimism during a recession. The researchers were surprised to see that there was no job growth during the post-9/11 recovery, and that there has been virtually no growth in full-time employment during the recovery. Economists have long theorized that an increase in job pessimism leads to a decrease in hiring. While it is often impossible to prove a negative, further research into the effects of job pessimism could lead to new economic policy that allows people to continue working in the face of a weak economy. While the results of the study do not predict a recession, it is clear that the current economy is doing little to encourage Americans to start a career. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, unemployment remains at approximately 10 percent. Moreover, as of April, the total number of jobs lost remains at a staggering 3.5 million jobs. In other words, jobs are still out there, but not at the same rate as before the recession. As a result, many Americans are forced into part-time employment. All of this can be traced to the unemployed worker who is simply too picky about the job he or she is looking for. However, the government is making an effort to encourage Americans to start a career. The recession in housing has created a new set of problems. Jobs are harder to come by than ever before, and even the “menial” jobs are difficult to find. As a result, millions of Americans are searching for jobs in the growing field of hospitality, fast food, and retail. Because of the housing crisis, many Americans have seen
