The talk tells a story about the development of a new programming language and what it can do for your project. Jörg Slawik is known for his work on the Java language, among other things. He is currently working as lead language designer at Google. KMS.net: Jörg Slawik s talk at OSCON 2017: Building a Programming Language in 2017

Projects use a variety of programming languages and tools, but most of the time they are bound to one or a couple. It used to be necessary to use one language or tool, then export the code to a new language or a new tool. No more. We have today the tools to build our applications with a large spectrum of programming languages in mind and in one single process. Chris Lalonde : Project Based Learning and Build Your Own Programming Language . A guy named Jörg Slawik has been thinking about this a lot for the last few years. Today, he is an Associate Language designer at Google, and he is researching a new programming language that enables a much broader spectrum of programming and tooling for people to build their own applications and components. Jörg Slawik is known for his work on the Java language, among other things. He is currently working as lead language designer at Google. What would it take to build a programming language that helps you develop end-user applications that actually work in every browser, in every platform, and in every phone you can imagine, in your pocket? A language that is easy to learn, easy to teach, easy to understand, and easy to use? Join us for a presentation about Building a Programming Language in 2017.
