Microvascular blood flow and tissue metabolism in human muscle tissue. The microvascular capillary blood flow and tissue metabolism in the biopsied vastus lateralis muscle were measured by the Na-22-water method. This method has advantages over the oxymetry technique since the relative contribution of the tissue metabolic activation to the overall flow can be determined. It was found that the capillary blood flow was considerably larger in the quadriceps muscle than previously reported in the calf muscle. This suggests that the capillary blood flow is regulated differently in the muscle tissue. In the microcirculation there was a considerable correlation between tissue metabolic activation and capillary blood flow which is in good agreement with observations made in the skin.

The role of myocardial scintigraphy in the diagnosis of coronary artery disease: current practices and future directions. The objective of this review was to critically analyze the current practice of myocardial perfusion scintigraphy (MPS) and to assess future developments in this technique. To achieve this, we have reviewed the literature published between December 2005 and December 2006 on the subjects of myocardial perfusion scintigraphy and/or coronary artery disease.

Contemporary literature. The present review highlights that MPS is a useful tool in the diagnosis of coronary artery disease and the detection of myocardial infarction; however, its performance is significantly affected by several confounding factors. These factors are discussed in detail in this review, and emphasis is placed on the utility of MPS with the use of modern quantitative perfusion methodology. The literature indicates that MPS is a useful tool in the diagnosis of coronary artery disease, and the detection of myocardial infarction. However, it is affected by significant factors. These confounding factors should be better delineated and correctly identified to optimize MPS imaging results. This is especially important in the era of quantitative perfusion evaluation of myocardial perfusion scintigraphy.
