Patients with colorectal melanoma may be included in various clinical series. One hundred thirty-three patients with colorectal melanoma were identified in a large hospital-based cancer registry, a population based cancer registry, and a private cancer registry. The records were reviewed retrospectively for information on clinical and pathologic characteristics of the tumors. One hundred five of these patients had sporadic disease; 8 had neurocutaneous melanosis. At the time of follow-up, 40 patients were deceased, with a median duration of follow-up of 4.5 years (range, 3 months to 22 years). The patients with multiple melanomas had a poorer median overall survival (16.5 years) compared with solitary melanomas (20.3 years, p = 0.04). Recurrences developed in 13 patients, including 10 patients with multiple primary tumors. The tumors were located in the transverse or descending colon in 31 patients. Features associated with decreased survival included tumor depth (>10 mm), primary tumor size (>5 cm), positive nodes, and synchronous liver metastases. Tumor depth and positive nodes are the most important prognostic factors in this subset of patients. Longer follow-up is required to assess the impact of additional factors, such as initial treatment and initial extent of disease.Latest News Recent News Bullpens coach PawSox bench boss Gary DiSarcina named Gary Woodland as the opening day starter for Pawtucket.
